The author of this quote wants to say that learning is often hard and unpleasant, like the bitter roots of a plant. But in the end, it gives a wonderful result, like a sweet fruit.

I agree with this idea. To learn something new, we must work hard. We spend many hours reading books, doing homework and preparing ^{for} exams. Sometimes we feel tired and want to give up. This is the "bitter" part. But when we finally understand a difficult topic or can use our knowledge in life, we feel very happy and proud. This is the "sweet" fruit.

We can see this in history and books. In the famous book "Harry Potter", the young wizard and his friends study hard and face many dangerous ~~things~~ at school. Their lessons are difficult and sometimes scary. But this knowledge later helps them to fight evil and save their friends.

In conclusion, I believe that the hard work we put into education is like bitter roots. It is not easy. But the rewards - good grades, useful skills and a successful future - are definitely sweet and worth the effort. I believe that despite the hard study, we need to go to the end, because then we will get good results.
